Network and Insfrastructure

Attackers often target the organization's network and infrastructure to make phishing more convincing or more harmful. They may set up fake servers, spoof legitimate domains, or exploit weak DNS settings to redirect users to malicious sites. If a company's network is poorly secured, attackers can intercept traffic, hijack sessions, or use compromised infrastructure to spread phishing emails internally, making the attack far harder to detect.